Both parents and teens alike often find the idea of teenagers travelling abroad scary! It's easy to let these fears hold us back and prevent us from seeing all of the awesome ways that overseas teen travel can transform teens into amazing young people. These reasons for teens to travel abroad are learned by everyone in their own individual way, providing teens of all ages with invaluable experiences that will last a lifetime.

Travelling is important for youth because it teaches meaningful life skills, provides an opportunity to meet new people, facilitates cultural appreciation on a deeper level, and teaches the ability to adapt to new environments. Travel is a fantastic way of gaining these unique experiences, and developing youth into more well-rounded citizens, all while having fun along the way!

First, you become an independent and responsible young person. Travelling on your own or with a group without the familiarity of people from home means that you need to take more responsibility of your own actions, as well as look out for those who are with you. One closely related skill you develop is saving and budgeting money. This is such a basic principle of life that everyone starts to learn from a young age, but nothing shows true maturity like saving up all school year for an epic trip throughout Europe that you can proudly say that you paid for partially or even all on your own.

Just when you think that you have planned the perfect budget, BOOM! Everything might not stay so perfect...and that's okay! International travel wouldn't be complete without the occasional bump in the road. Dealing with problems like pouring rain when the forecast predicted sun for your bike tour through Amsterdam or your sandal breaking as you descend the Acropolis will make you an active problem-solver.

Also, when you come back home, you can teach your friends and family about the people and their cultures that you have learned about. Instill in them the same curiosity about differences and appreciation of similarities across cultures that they might have never thought to consider. Keep an open mind and an open heart and never stop sharing everything that it means to be a global citizen.
